G. Summary of my Activities and Future Plans

Throughout my academic career, my research interest has focused on two main fields: migration (with special emphasis on labor market issues) and leadership. In the early years, I examined the economic and social integration of first- and second- generation immigrants in Israel originating from different countries. Following my doctoral thesis, for several years I studied the economic and social integration of immigrants in Israel, focusing on two highly-skilled groups: immigrants from Western countries (North American and French migrants) and from the Former Soviet Union (FSU). I was one of the researchers in large international comparative study, headed by Prof. Moshe Semyonov, on the economic integration of FSU immigrants in four immigrant societies (Canada, USA, Germany and Israel). The study focused on the difficulties these immigrants face in specific occupations, and on the differences between countries in admission terms and labor market policy.

Using my knowledge of migration literature and my interest in business administration and labor market issues, I addressed other research questions related to the immigration process. I conducted several studies aiming at understanding the immigration decision-making process, an issue rarely studied in the Israeli context. In these studies I applied theories of social networks as well as models of consumer decision-making to better understand the migration decision process. Nowadays I'm a part of an international research team working on an Erasmus+ project examining the migration decision-making process of Ukrainian refugees following the Russian-Ukrainian war. These studies point to the importance of subjective parameters in the immigration and integration process. In order to deepen my understanding of this particular area, I conducted several additional studies on subjective parameters involved in the immigration process, and studied the involvement of variables such as subjective well-being, quality of life, life satisfaction, sense of belonging and identity.

To further understand the economic and social integration of highly skilled immigrants in Israel, this time from an organizational perspective, I turned my research attention to immigrants within organizations. I focused on the Israeli high-tech industry as a multi-cultural setting, and explored how cultural values and organizational perceptions affect the work experiences of immigrants and their veteran Israeli counterparts. These studies yielded significant insights on the cultural differences between groups in their organizational perceptions and their work aspirations and motivations. In addition, I examined the work experiences of Israeli returnees from Western countries to the Israeli high-tech industry as well as to jobs in Israeli academia. In the last two years I'm involved (with my colleague, Dr. Shirly Bar-Lev) in several research studies on the integration of French immigrants in the Israeli labor market. In these studies, we address an interesting and unique employment pattern of French immigrants- employment in French companies (mainly call centers) located in Israel. Our studies explore the consequences of such an employment pattern to the immigrant's integration.

Leadership is my second field of interest. From 2000-2004, I coordinated a large field study on the formation and development of leadership from a social-psychology perspective. This study, headed by Prof. Micha Popper and Dr. Reuven Gal, tested a formula for defining leadership, based on the individual's psychological potential, his/her motivation to lead, and his/her past leadership experiences. I use the insights obtained from this study in my current immigration research. I am examining the role of leadership in the decision-making process of North Americans immigrating to Israel in the past decade. In addition, my studies on the work experiences of immigrants in the Israeli high-tech industry examine leadership variables such as motivation to lead and preferred leadership styles. These studies enabled me to combine my two main research fields, immigration and leadership, and I plan to further develop this direction, adding organizational concepts and considerations into the migration study.
